Summary Mexico City #1

Mexico City has a big water problem, so many citizens get very little water. A major problem is bad pumping equipment which wastes water. Also, there is increasing need for water, and large beverage companies are using lots of water.

#2

Long ago Mexico City had lots of water, but the water was removed to create the city. Then water was taken from underground and from rivers. Recently, water has been taken from long distances, which is difficult to deliver.

Summarize the following passages in a few sentences. Check your work against the summary checklist.

1. Music video is a relatively new entry into the world of television, having become common only in the 1980s. Music video is difficult to categorize and to illustrate with one example, because it includes so many different types of expression. The definitive characteristic is in its name: There is music and there is video imagery. Some music videos dramatize the words of a song or even create brief visual dramas that are only vaguely related to the music. Some offer a message or statement. Some are relatively straightforward recordings of the performers at work. Obviously, defining the art of music video is not an easy task. (Living with Art, Rita Gilbert)

According to Rita Gilbert in the article "Living with Art," music videos are fairly recent, and there are various kinds. All of them contain songs and moving pictures. A number of them show a story or idea, but others only show artists' performances.

2. Charles Darwin, an English naturalist and explorer, began a five-year expedition in December 1831 on a ship called the Beagle. The expedition reached Bahia in Brazil in the spring of 1832. Darwin was amazed by the number and dazzling colors of the flowers and birds he saw. The Beagle then sailed south along the coast of Patagonia where the crew discovered the fossil remains of several extinct animals. In September 1835 the expedition reached the remote Galapagos Islands. There Darwin saw birds, animals and plants that are found nowhere else on earth because they had developed in isolation from their relatives in America. They were to play an important part in Darwin's theories on how animals and humans evolved. (Discovery, Everett, Reid, and Fara)

In "Discovery," Everett, Reid and Fara state that Darwin began a long journey to South America in 1831. After seeing incredible nature in Brazil, he uncovered ancient creatures in Patagonia. In the Galapagos they saw some very unique species, and these discoveries contributed to Darwin's ideas about evolution.

3. Beginning in the Middle East at least 10,000 years ago, some peoples began to purposely sow the seeds of their food plants. It was a practice that allowed them to produce adequate amounts of food in the areas near their settlements rather than pursuing game and living as nomads. At the same time, they gradually tamed and domesticated wild animals for their food, hides and labor. An agricultural lifestyle led to the first towns and cities, the development of tools, baskets and pots, which led to the development of commerce and new crafts and skills. Agriculture played a significant role in developing the control over our existence that distinguishes humans from other species. (Biology!, Postlethwait, Hopson, and Veres)

According to Postlethwait, Hopson and Veres in "Biology!" people developed farming long ago and then didn't have to travel for sustenance. They began to use animals for different things and to live in larger communities. This resulted in finance, new products, and the ability to rule nature.

The article "Moon Landings" discusses some of the history, developments and problems with traveling to the moon. From the first to the sixth visit to the moon in the 1960s and 1970s, the amount of research and gathering of material increased significantly. As a result of these moon missions, a lot of work was done on improving computers, developing smaller computers, and creating the Internet. A problem related to staying on the moon is the lack of water, but test rockets are being used to determine whether water is actually available there. Traveling on the moon is hard because the surface is very rough, and having no atmosphere results in damage from space rocks.
